Much of Ryan Marlatt's practice has been centered around the construction industry and he has represented major national and international contractors in all manner of litigation, including construction defects, personal injuries on the construction site, and other contractual disputes. He is often consulted on matters in advance of litigation and continues his representation should litigation ensue.

Ryan represents his clients in complex negotiations and business dealings that ensure his clients are afforded the best defense possible. With his in-depth examination and interpretation of the complex defense and indemnity obligations, Ryan routinely saves his clients significant sums.

Ryan also has a particular interest in products litigation and represents product manufacturers in catastrophic injury and death cases. This passion arises from the beginnings of his working life as an employee of a major medical device manufacturer that almost went bankrupt as a result of products liability litigation. In this role Ryan saw first-hand the repercussions of litigation on the employees of these companies at all levels and fights not just for the companies, but its employees.

In addition to these areas, Ryan also has significant experience in a variety of maritime and commercial litigation issues.

Maritime

- Investigate and litigate injuries occurring on vessels in port and blue water including interactions with the US Coast Guard, OSHA, vessel owners, and vessel crew.
- Defend offshore platform injury cases.
- Investigate potential pollution matters.
- Investigate and litigate collision and allision matters.

Products Liability

Ryan investigates and defends products liability matters involving both consumer and commercial grade products.

Types/categories of products defended:

- Automotive and automotive parts manufacturers—design and manufacturing defects
- Industrial products—maintenance and use in various applications.
- Consumer kitchen appliances—issues relating to design and use in various applications.
